

Supporting aged and dying clients: Essential considerations and skills.

A compassionate and strengths-based approach for clients and their families.

Many people claim that we will die the same way we choose to live. This workshop will explore this premise and the correlation of the attitudes of ageing with finally preparing for our death. Is it just a matter of attitude? What does the current research say about ageing with resilience? Evidence suggests that emotional wellbeing generally increases with age unless the older person is experiencing some major health issue or disadvantage (Centre for Mental Health 2014).

Beate will address these issues and provide opportunities to explore what makes older people resilient, what makes them better equipped to live a good life and to be better prepared for dying. This workshop is based on applying a “strength-based” approach.

As we age, we hope for “quality of life and wellness” and a “good death”. But what does that really mean and how can we support our clients on their final journey? Principles of palliative care, will be incorporated which means affirming life and regarding dying as a normal process. You will have an opportunity to develop skills, identify resources and ideas that will enable you to support your clients and carers more confidently during this final stage. Caring for someone with dementia and related loss experiences for the carer and the client will be incorporated in the day.

‘unfinished business’ will be explored and how to approach ‘difficult conversations’ about the inevitable. Self-care strategies will be identified to ensure we don’t burn out in this very intense work with our clients.

Learning objectives of this training:

1. Identify the impact of the ageing process.
2. Examine the constant challenges of living with change and loss.
3. Develop strategies for connecting with older people.
4. Explore what makes an older person resilient to life’s challenges.
5. Discuss strategies which encourage and promote the spirit of personal, familial, interpersonal and societal resilience in older people.
6. Learn strategies that will allow clients to recognise their strengths and weaknesses.
7. Identify different responses to end of life loss.
8. Explore and appreciate the issues to be considered when supporting the dying and their families.
9. Name the principles of supportive communication with the dying.

Beate will share her extensive knowledge, clinical experience and practical approaches and methods throughout the day.
